This book embodies years of research into the lives and deaths of one college's alumni during World War Two. Ranging from dispersed Pacific islands to battlefields in Germany, Pueblo Junior College contributed to the nation's war efforts in all branches of service. These Soldiers, Sailors, Airmen, and Marines are not forgotten. The author, a current faculty member at Pueblo Community College, spent years of personal time contacting remaining family members. Some contributed family photographs and personal information that otherwise would remain unknown to the general history researcher. It is the story of an average American city which contributed to the national effort to win World War II and, in doing so, lost some of their best and brightest citizens --- those who may have become their future leaders. Although tinged with sadness, this narrative documents their background, training, and circumstances of death so that their names and contributions are remembered for future generations --- and that their service to their country and their deaths were not in vain.
