Excerpt from O'er Tartar Deserts, or English and Russian in Central Asia

There was a stir in the crowd of Russian promenaders that eddied along the broad, white pavement of the 'Kooznetski Most' (Blacksmith's Bridge), the Regeut Street of Moscow, on a bright, keen April afternoon; and all the way down the steep, curving incline of the famous street - from which the last snow of the six months' winter had just been cleared - heads were being turned round, fingers pointed, and excited whispers passed from man to man.
